Excerpt: .another place for me; but Miss Walton, who called at our cottage the day after I went home, expressed her fears that there would be many temptations in my future situation very dangerous to a girl of my age and disposition. From what Harriet says, it is a gay, worldly family that she is going into, remarked my kind teacher; and I cannot help wishing, Mrs. Eussell, that before engaging to go, she had asked the advice of her friends at home. My mother could not bear to hear any of her children ever so slightly blamed. As for that, ma am, said she, poor people cannot choose; and Harriet did not want to be out of place when there are so many mouths to fill at home. She has got an excellent character, and I m not afraid but she ll do her best to keep it. Miss Walton mildly replied that she hoped I should seek for a better strength than my own; and then changed the subject by asking when Ned was expected home. He was to come the very next day: so lucky, as mother said, that we should be there together, so fond of each other as we two had been from our cradles. I was not to go to my place until the end of the following week; I had therefore quite a long holiday before me. My mother began to bustle about the house, for she was...
